UNIONISM IS RECOGNIZED

Association of Workmen Upheld—
Would Abolish Child Labor—
Equal Pay for Men and Women.

WASHINGTON, April 29.—The nine clauses proposed by the commission on international labor legislation for insertion in the peace treaty as adopted by the peace conference in plenary session at Paris yesterday, were made public here today by the state department. Among the principles incorporated are a standard eight-hour day, week day of rest, the abolition of child labor, equality of pay for men and women, and workmen's "right of association for all lawful purposes."

The text as adopted follows: "The high contracting parties, recognizing that the welfare of labor and of the individual wage earners is of supreme international importance, have framed a permanent machinery associated with that of the league to further this great end. They recognize that difference of climate, habits and customs of economic opportunity and industrial tradition make strict uniformity in the conditions of labor difficult of immediate attainment. But, holding as they do, that labor remedies probably error in transmission, he regarded merely as an article of commerce, they think that there are methods which all industrial communities should endeavor to apply as far as their special circumstances will permit.

"Among these methods and principles the following seems to be of special and urgent importance:

"First—The guiding principle above enunciated that labor should not be regarded merely as a commodity or article of commerce.

"Second—The right of association of all lawful purposes by the employed as well as by the employers.

"Third—The payment to the employed of a wage adequate to maintain a reasonable standard of life in the country in their time and country.

"Fourth—The adoption of an eight-hour day or a 48-hour week as the standard to be aimed at where it has not already been obtained.

"Fifth—The adoption of a weekly rest of at least 24 hours which should include Sunday whenever practicable.

"Sixth—The abolition of child labor and the disposition of such limitations on the labor of young persons as shall permit the continuation of their education and assure their proper physical development.

"Seventh—The principle that men and women should receive equal remuneration of equal scale.

"Eighth—The standard set by law in each country with respect to the conditions of labor should have due regard to the equitable economic treatment of all workers lawfully resident therein.

"Ninth—Each state should make provision for a system of inspection by which women should take part in order to insure the enforcement of the laws and regulations for the protection of the employed.

"Without claiming that these methods and principles are either complete or final, the high contracting parties are of opinion that they are well fitted to guide the policy of the league of nations and that if adopted by the industrial communities who are members of the league and safeguarded in practice by an adequate system of such inspection, they will confer lasting benefits upon the wage earners of the world."

Andrew and Imogene

It was with mingled coaxing and bullying that Imogene had induced him to put on evening clothes and accompany her to the symphony concert. Their seats were good and the program was well under way and she had watched in vain for some symptom of interest on his part. He had carefully examined the boxes and his opera glasses had traced the sweep of the procession with an one-eyed pantist had performed. The music did not seem to hold his attention.

Just before intermission a noted artist on the cello began that glorious composition Huberman's Melody in E. With the great orchestra accompanying him. As the string pulled out his sweet evidence of the great master, peace she lost sight of Andrew and his wandering attention and became absorbed in the music.

Some plaintive strain carried her back to her old home and again she trudged down the lane to the little schoolhouse in the grove, clad in gingham pinafore with two pigtales of hair hanging beneath a pink sunbonnet. She recalled the day, some of the bees in the grove, the dahlias and the peonies which stood the path from the front gate up to the house. She dreamed of the dusk when Sheep, with sharp stecco barks doubled and twisted on the track of half a dozen cows belatedly coming home in the gloaming to be milked.

From across the meadow seemed to come the mournful cry of the whippoorwill as he called his plaintive love song to his mate in the forest beyond.

From around the corner of the veranda seemed to come the mingled odor of honeysuckle, magnolia and jessamine and from an inner room mingled the drone of an old fashioned spinning wheel.

Again she found the daisies back in the negro quarters behind the kitchen and their low, plaintive notes to the melody of banjo and guitar. From over the edge of the curfew came the mellow call of the high white, gathering his scattered flock for the night that they might sit in a circle, with every head turned inward, and guard against the marauding fox.

Again she strolled with Andrew across the road to the orchard where he first told her that he loved her and where his kiss was imprinted on her lips.

Again she heard the melody in the village church in the cadence of the wedding march as she walked down the aisle with him and again she felt the pressure of her mother's arms as she bade her good-by after placing the wreath of orange blossoms on her head.

The music died down, the wild applause broke forth and she turned to Andrew to find his chin cupped in his hand as though he, too, were dreaming. "I want to marry you," she whispered, she slipped her hand into his and with knowing pressure waited until the great artist played his encore.

"What are you thinking of, honey boy?" she asked in a whisper. "I was wondering whether that chiroplast up on Herkimer street could do anything for this corn of mine," he said.

"You have the soul of an anglerworm!" she snapped, jerking her hand away. He looked at her in wonder and surprise. (Copyright, Twenty-First Century Press, Inc.)
